The work of laying the track of the Northampton and Williamsburg street railway is progressing favorably, and mainly completed in the village, through a part of Elm street. Branches from the main line will be laid by the Bay State mills and the new international screw nail factory, now building. An injunction lately laid on the company by Superintendent Yeamans of the Canal railroad, to prevent them from crossing his track near the Connecticut River railroad depot, will probably be removed with little trouble, and without delaying the completion of the enterprise.
